How to Write a Void Check First, it's important to know that you should never give someone a blank check, especially someone you don't know. This is because anyone can fill it out and withdraw money from your bank account. A simple rule to remember would be to treat checks like cash. This is why employers ask for a voided check to set up direct deposit, not a blank one. To void a check for direct deposit, you can: Write VOID in big letters across the entire face of the check Or, write VOID in the: date line payee line amount box amount line signature line Use a black or blue pen to write void. You want the ink to be permanent. After you void the check, record the voided check number in your checkbook. This will help you remember that the check was voided and you're not waiting for it to clear your account. If that check number is posted to your account, contact your bank right away. Finally, if you use duplicate checks, make sure your VOID marks are seen on the duplicate, too.
